It's quotable

Elected officials have a responsibility to their public; a responsibility to stand rather than hide behind their words.

While public officials characteristically, and sometimes justifiably, point the finger at the press for the inaccuracies and indiscretions reported in the print and broadcast media, they themselves are often the instigators of a steadily growing communication problem.

It is not uncommon at municipal meetings throughout Union County for instance, to hear officials preface a statement at a public meeting by saying, "This is off the record," or "This is not for publication."

In the case of private interviews, providing information to reporters off-the-record is a politician's prerogative and right, but this too is frequently abused. Some public officials won't say anything on the record, making it nearly impossible for a reporter to gather information; others make off-the-record statements about perfectly routine issues which do not necessitate such secrecy, while some have a knack for habitually leaking information, without agreeing to be identified as the source of attribution.

It's important to remember that when a public official abuses the "off-the-record" prerogative, or when a reporter is only able to obtain his information from sources who won't identify themselves, the reader's criticism should be directed to the elected official and not to the newspaper.

Any official who truly believes that encouraging the flow of accurate, thoroughly reported news of the community is essential to promoting the development of a well-informed public can help accomplish this purpose by learning how to use proper discretion in distinguishing when and when not to request off-the-record protection.

New Jersey report

More state environment action needed

By GOV. TOM KEAN During the past three years, we in New Jersey have made enormous strides in attacking environmental problems.

More than any other state, we have gone the extra mile to tackle problems ranging from dioxin contamination to asbestos in schools and public buildings.

Our Department of Environmental Protection (DEP), under the leadership of Commissioner Bob Hughes, is nationally recognized as one which does not shy away from the question that other states will be years in addressing.

Environmental problems are uniquely challenging public issues. By their very nature they are emotional — because they directly affect people's lives.

Federal, not just state, action needed

By DAVID F. MOORE Gov. Tom Kean told it like it is in his recent State of the State message. This is the year of the environment.

At least one hopes that's where the action will be. That's because the federal Clean Air Act, Clean Water Act, Superfund and pesticide regulatory act will all come up for consideration this year.

David F. Moore is executive director of the N.J. Conservation Foundation.

commitment that far exceeds the political life-time of most public servants in New Jersey.

It is because of this important and timely opportunity that I have asked the Legislature that, acting together, we make 1985 Year of the Environment in New Jersey.

I believe we are on the brink of even greater achievement.

There is no getting around a central fact about solid waste — it is going to be increasingly expensive to dispose of garbage in New Jersey, and in every other state.

State we're in Such different interpretations depending on where you're coming from.

I hope it's safe to predict that neither we, as citizens, nor Congress will soon forget what can happen when too much flexibility is built into environmental law.

And while New Jersey has some pretty good laws of its own, it's no fun talking so much dirt and garbage from neighboring states.

It's just that we need some strong interstate controls so that one state doesn't get to be the dump for another.

The many faces of E.G. Marshall

E.G. 'marshals' skills at Mill

By BEA SMITH

Trying to interview E. G. Marshall is like inheriting the wind. Trying to pin him down for a brief chat can become a frustrating experience. Before one can settle down and pose a pen, he is gone with the wind.

It all happened rather dizzily last week, when upon arriving for an interview at the Paper Mill Playhouse, Millburn, with one of the two stars in the current play, "Inherit the Wind" (the other star is Robert Vaughn), this reporter was informed that the schedules had become confused, and a photo session with the whole cast (more than 40 members) had been assigned for the same time.

After profuse apologies from both the director of public relations, Albertina Reilly ("You're an old pro at this; do it between the picture-taking"), and the sweet, gentle veteran actor ("Just follow me around; we'll get the job done"), we were directed, rather than to Marshall's dressing room, as originally planned, to the stage, among the familiar courtroom scenery.

"Here," Marshall said, as we climbed upon a platform that led to a jury box, "we'll sit in the jury box."

"This is my first time at the Paper Mill," he said in a soft, subdued voice, "and I like it very much. With this play, I want to see how far I can go. You know, a part like this can be as big as you can be."

Marshall plays the prosecuting attorney in the Jerome Lawrence-Robert E. Lee stage drama based on the famed Scopes "monkey trial" in Dayton, Tenn., in 1925, and produced on Broadway as "Inherit the Wind" in 1955.

"Just once," said Marshall, "I want to exceed my limit. This is a very strong play," he said in a stronger voice as the stage began to fill with noisy cast members in preparation of the picture session. "It's a big play; not a drawing room comedy. And the subject matter is getting a new velocity." (The subject matter is the controversy of whether man was descended from Adam and Eve as the Bible tells us, or from a branch of the ape family as Charles Darwin explains in his text on evolution.)

At that moment, the two of us began revolving as the jury box was turned on its axles and brought forth to the front of the stage. We clutched the sides of our jury chairs and held on for dear life. "Time to get off," Marshall grinned as he jumped even before the jury box stopped twirling. This reporter gasped, waited shakily for a complete stop, and stepped off gingerly.

Tripping-over-props, stumbling into mobs of cast members preparing to take their places, and nearly colliding with the busy stage manager, we stepped into the wings while marveling at the agility of the actor who is in his 70s.
